INTRODUCTION

Tiffany Chung is globally noted for her interdisciplinary practice that enquires into a complex framework of social, political, economic, and environmental processes, at times entwined in landscape archaeology and historical ecology. Unpacking conflict, geopolitical partitioning, spatial transformation, environmental crisis, and forced migration across time and terrain, Chung analyzes and materializes researched findings into hand-drawn and embroidered cartographic works and mixed media installations consisting of drawings, paintings, photographs, sculptures, and videos. Chung's work strives to create interventions into the narrative produced through statecraft or is dominant in the public sphere with people's memories and lived experiences.

Chung's upcoming projects include a public installation at the National Mall (DC) and a solo exhibition at the Dallas Museum of Art, slated to open in August 2023. Chung has exhibited at museums and biennials worldwide including MoMA (NY), Smithsonian American Art Museum (SAAM), British Museum (UK), Louisiana MoMA & SMK (Denmark), SchirnKunsthalle Frankfurt (Germany), Nobel Peace Center (Norway), Venice Biennale (Italy), Sharjah Biennale (UAE), Biennial de Cuenca (Ecuador), Sydney Biennale (Australia), EVA International-Ireland's Biennial, Centre de Cultura Contemporània de Barcelona (Spain), 21st Century Museum of Contemporary Art, Kanazawa (Japan), Gwangju Bienalle (Korea), among other venues. Public collections include SAAM, British Museum, Louisiana MoMA, SFMoMA, Minneapolis Institute of Art, M+ Museum, Queensland Art Gallery, Singapore Art Museum, and others.

Chung is a Mellon Arts & Practitioner Fellow at RITM, Yale University (2021). She was a finalist for the Vera List Center Prize and named Jane Lombard Fellow for Art & Social Justice (2018-2020). Chung has been a recipient of Asia Arts Game Changer Award by Asia Society (India, 2020), Asian Cultural Council Grant (NY, 2015), Sharjah Biennial Artist Prize (2013). She is a co-founder of Sàn Art (HCMC, Vietnam). Chung holds an MFA from University of California, Santa Barbara (2000).

The second edition of the Diriyah Contemporary Art Biennale, titled After Rain, opened to the public on February 20. It runs through May 24, 2024. Organized by the Diriyah Biennale Foundation, After Rain is led by Artistic Director Ute Meta Bauer and takes place in the JAX District, a creative district with industrial heritage in the historic town of Diriyah. Featuring work by artists from Saudi Arabia and around the world, the exhibition explores the role of a contemporary art biennial in a country that is undergoing rapid social change.

After Rain brings together artists of diverse backgrounds who investigate the relationship between humans and nature, examine the built environment, observe and interact with the landscapes that surround us, recount histories, and encourage us to listen more closely. Conceived as a vibrant entity rather than a static framework, the Biennale's multi-format platforms consist of an exhibition, the Biennale Encounters series of public programs, a film program, performances, research projects, and dialogues.

After Rain features 177 works from 100 artists and artist groups, of which over 30 are from the wider Gulf region. The Diriyah Biennale Foundation supported 47 new commissions from artists including Jumana Emil Abboud, Sara Abdu, Mohammad AlFaraj, Azra Akšamija, Tarek Atoui, Rachaporn Choochuey, Vikram Divecha, Christine Fenzl, Anne Holtrop, Armin Linke & Ahmed Mater, NJOKOBOK (Youssou Diop and Apolonija Šušteršič), and Camille Zakharia. There will also be a welcoming work by Tania Mouraud staged on a roundabout and a long-term project by Mariah Lookman presented at Shamalat, a cultural space at the periphery of old Diriyah.

Many of the artworks included in After Rain share a focus on basic human needs such as water, food, and shelter. The works are rooted in artistic research and informed by the curatorial team's trips across Saudi Arabia, which resulted in a multigenerational artistic conversation. The Biennale presents a multisensory experience—foregrounding touch, taste, and smell in addition to sight and sound—and invites visitors to become part of an immersive journey.

The exhibition occupies six expansive halls across 12,900 square metres and also extends into adjacent courtyards and terraces, turning these areas into works of art and social spaces. Various shaded gathering places are introduced, including a communal kitchen and a juice bar. A year-long series of artist talks, workshops, and presentations of sound and performance art, titled Biennale Encounters, has been welcoming local audiences since April 2023. A purpose-built black box theater will showcase ten films on rotation, and a special area is dedicated to research-based works and the processes that inform exhibited artworks. The Learning Garden, a digital extension of the Biennale, will continue after the exhibition closes in May.

entangled traces, disremembered landscapes
糾纏的痕跡，遺忘的風景

Kiang Malingue, Hong Kong
馬凌畫廊，香港

20.3.23 - 6.5.23

Kiang Malingue presents entangled traces, disremembered landscapes, Tiffany Chung's first solo exhibition in Hong Kong, featuring new cartographic works and a 3-channel video installation. By tracing the entanglements of nature, culture, colonialism, war, and state-making, and introducing pivotal temporal aspects to the act of mapping, the internationally acclaimed artist continues her ever-deepening exploration of geopolitics, history, and memory, marking critical shifts in historical narratives.

The works on view include an edition of USM GLOBAL (2022-2023) commissioned by PAFA, a delicately textured piece associated with Studying for USM GLOBAL, Chung's online archive of her research in mapping the U.S. military global footprint and spotlighting regions including countries in Sub-Saharan Africa, Syria, Iraq, and Afghanistan in Southwest & Central Asia, as well as Okinawa, Japan in the Asia Pacific. Chung also layers the complex history between the U.S. and Hawai'i in the late 19th century, and between the U.S. and Japan during WWII in her drawing from faraway lands to dust we return (2018), referencing Hawai'i as a traumatic site of memory: transpacific migration, plantation labor, economic expansion, and military imperialism. Her personal quest for understanding the conflict known as the Vietnam War and its aftermath has led Chung further into unpacking how the United States' commercial interests intertwined with its Cold War policy and political influence in places such as Guatemala, exemplified in another embroidery work El Pulpo: UFCo's Great White Fleet Routes and Properties in Central America & the Caribbean (2020).

New works on vellum and paper from the Terra Rouge: circles, traces of time, rebellious solitude series inspect the terra rouge plateau of Binh Long–Phước Long in three distinct periods, depicting Neolithic circular earthworks (CEW) dated between 2300-300 B.C.; an extensive network of rubber plantations established in 1897 by French colonialists; and abandoned airfields that Chung's father frequented as a South Vietnamese helicopter pilot during wartime. Chung contends that revisiting Neolithic circular earthworks might lead us to imagine a different possibility—a hypothetical trajectory in which earthwork groups had never been incorporated into a new socioeconomic and political polity, but instead chosen to remain in what the artist calls “rebellious solitude.”

In the 3-channel video If Water Has Memories (2022), Chung retrieved from the UNHCR archive statistics, archival maps, and coordinates of pirate attack locations between October 1985 and June 1986 in the Gulf of Thailand, where she filmed the body of water that witnessed Vietnamese refugees enduring acts of violence. Performing a symbolic burial at sea, this poignant gesture of remembrance commemorates lost lives and calls for acknowledgment of historical atrocities in hope of healing. Interweaving music, poetry, and moving image, the work meditates on loss and trauma while reminding us of the humanity buried underneath the inhumanity.

馬凌畫廊榮譽呈獻「糾纏的痕跡，遺忘的風景」，蒂梵妮·鍾於香港的首個個展，展出多個系列的地圖繪畫作品，以及一件三通道影像裝置作品。通過追溯自然、文化、殖民主義、戰爭及國家構建等元素的糾纏關係，並通過為地圖繪製實踐添加時間性，享譽國際的蒂梵妮·鍾持續深入探索地緣政治、歷史及記憶等主題，在歷史敘事中開拓新的認知轉變。「糾纏的痕跡，遺忘的風景」展覽中可見《美國全球軍事行動》(2022-2023)，蒂梵妮·鍾受賓夕凡尼亞藝術學院美術館委託創作的全新刺繡作品之一。此件質感細膩的刺繡作品與蒂梵妮·鍾的線上文獻庫「美國全球軍事行動研究」緊密相連——藝術家長期追蹤並研究美國全球軍事足跡，並集中關注其在撒哈拉以南非洲國家、敘利亞、伊拉克、阿富汗等西亞或中亞國家以及沖繩等地的行動軌跡。

蒂梵妮·鍾進而通過《遠道而來，歸塵而去》(2018) 等作品層疊處理了十九世紀末美國與夏威夷的複雜歷史，以及美國與日本在二戰時的歷史——在她的手中，夏威夷是創傷記憶的場址：跨洋遷徙運動；種植園勞力；經濟擴張；以及軍事帝國主義。蒂梵妮·鍾致力於理解被稱作越南戰爭的衝突事件及其遺產，而這使命引領她進一步研究美國海外軍事擴張活動的歷史，並揭示美國摻雜了冷戰政策的商業利益、施加的政治影響等；展覽中的另一件刺繡作品《八爪魚：聯合果品公司在中美洲及加勒比地區的偉大白色艦隊航線及產業》(2020) 即探討了美國對危地馬拉等地區施加的影響。

來自「紅土地：圓環，時間蹤跡，反叛孤獨」系列的全新牛皮紙上繪畫作品探索了越南西南部的平隆—福隆區域的三個歷史維度：在公元前2300至300年建立並使用的新石器時代圓環狀土建工程；在1897年由法國殖民者率先建立的龐大橡膠種植園網絡；以及蒂梵妮·鍾的父親作為一名南越直升機駕駛員在戰爭時期頻繁往返的多個荒廢軍用機場。蒂梵妮·鍾認為，回顧新石器時代圓環狀土建工程意味著去想像不同的可能性——在一種假想式的歷史發展軌跡中，建立了這些土建工程的族群從未進入新的社會—經濟—政治體系，而是選擇維繫被藝術家稱作「反叛孤獨」的狀態。

在創作三通道影像作品《如果水有記憶》(2022) 時，蒂梵妮·鍾使用了聯合國難民署數據、歷史地圖及1985年10月至1986年6月間泰國海灣海盜襲擊地標等資料，並前往當地進行拍攝——曾有大量越南難民在當地遭遇難以言說的暴力。藝術家重訪歷史暴力的場址，舉行象徵性的海葬儀式，通過緬懷的姿態紀念逝去的生命，旨在喚起人們對事件的關注，以最終完成療癒的使命。此件大型影像裝置將音樂、詩歌、聲音地景及影像藝術等媒介編織在一起，思考生命流逝及創傷的意義，提醒我們去挖掘深埋在非人性之下的人性光芒。

The 21st Biennale of Sydney examines the world today by borrowing the word 'superposition', the quantum mechanical term that refers to an overlapping situation. Microscopic substances like electrons are said to be dualistic in nature: they paradoxically exist in the form of waves and granular particles simultaneously. The state of superposition lies across all conceptual levels: from different climates and cultures to views of nature and the cosmic orders, conceptions of Mother Earth and interpretations of land ownership, readings of human history and conditions, the history of modern and contemporary art and the meaning of abstractions. The 21st Biennale of Sydney offers a panoramic view of how they all come together in a state of 'equilibrium', while delving into the workings of individual phenomena, considering the equivalence of these opposing notions through the lens of 'engagement'.

According to the theory of Wuxing in ancient Chinese natural philosophy, everything in this world is made up five main elements: wood, fire, earth, metal and water. Each of these elements gives rise to the next element, either through a process of symbiosis, where one element encourages the formation of the others, or a situation of mutual conflict and antagonism, in which each element resists and suppresses the others. These reciprocal relationships are regulating the cardinal directions, the seasons, colours, our bodily organs and functions, and emotions. In reality, a diversity of elements come together in a state of repeated collision, collapse and rebirth at each level, and today we seem to be witnessing an accelerated process of antagonistic conflict between different standards of value, faiths and beliefs, and political systems.

The participating artists in the 21st Biennale of Sydney were not chosen to represent or symbolise a particular theme. By placing these artworks, oriented towards diverse concerns and issues which resonate with overall perspectives of the Biennale on multiple levels, across seven venues in the city of Sydney, it is my hope that the Biennale as a whole will serve as a microcosm of the history of Earth, the human race, and a condensed version of the history of Sydney. From the repeatedly overlapping value systems contained within, the Biennale will encourage us to consider how all things in this world interact with complementarity in a state of equilibrium and engagement. Taking Sydney in 2018 as a starting point, the 21st Biennale of Sydney SUPERPOSITION: Equilibrium & Engagement promises to be a creative and critical experience for observing the world.

The Syria Project emerged in tandem with Chung's deepening investigations into the post-1975 worldwide exodus of Vietnamese seeking to flee the newly unified Communist state. With her own memories of the refugee experience, Chung's preoccupation with the current war in Syria has inspired research into the crisis and her ongoing tracking of the conflict and displacement of Syrians. The Syria Project also relates to the research carried out for Scratching the Walls of Memory, as Chung tracks historical mapping projects in the Middle East carried out by colonial regimes, namely Great Britain and France. The politically constructed borders, such as the one drawn as a result of the 1916 Sykes-Picot Agreement, bore deeper ramifications for human populations then and now. The impact of this colonial partitioning in the Middle East provides context for the ongoing conflict in Syria, in which large-scale massacres, bombings, use of chemical warfare, and escalating refugee numbers have reached about 6.8 million and 6.7 million IDPs (Internally Displaced Persons). Giving alternative form to the numbers and data, The Syria Project comprises cartographic drawings referencing dates and areas of conflict and control, or the growing numbers of refugee camps, refugees, and IDPs. Tracking statistical data related to urban destruction, civilian deaths, refugee and IDP numbers, selected focal matter was extracted and codified through dots, circles, and lines in a body of map drawings exhibited at the 56th Venice Biennale. The panoply of 40 drawings presented in its central exhibition All The World's Futures, carefully displayed on the wall like a geometric arrangement of tesserae, simulates the clusters of painstakingly rendered marks within each frame, each a portrait of crumbling humanity. With their statistical basis and acutely empirical titles, such as Syria Tracker: numbers of children killed in different governorates, March 2011-November 2014, or her latest tracking ISW: areas of control; UNHCR: numbers & locations of Syrian refugees and IDPs as of April 2019, the intoxicatingly aesthetic presentation attempts to still the audience and bite into our senses. These are precisely rendered infographic topographies, mesmerizing for the minute dots and circles condensed or dispersed, floating or receding, in coloristic tapestry-like patterns. Yet each mark – representing numbers of lost or displaced lives – speaks to a scale of brutality and dehumanization that is inescapably delimited and hollowed out in data records comprising never-ending lists of numbers.

“We took the boat here. 60 people packed in a dinghy for 15. A gun would be put at our foreheads if we resisted getting on the boat. In order to map the scale and scope of the Vietnamese refugee migration, both unofficially by boats and via the Orderly Departure Program (ODP), Chung analyzed the correspondence cables and records from government and intra-governmental agencies that handled the Vietnamese refugees, found during her research at the UNHCR in Geneva over a period of two years. Chung conducted interviews with resettled people in places such as Côte d'Ivoire and Senegal, whose testimonies helped her make sense of the incomplete and fragmented historical records. The archival documents and personal interviews guided Chung in understanding the breadth of this migration, which saw many Vietnamese ending up in the unexpected regions of Africa, the Middle East, and Latin America. Combining those with her research into the history of commercial air carriers' pathways and capacities, Chung was able to map out the trajectories of the ODP flights that had carried Vietnamese refugees. For the escape boat routes, Chung borrowed a chart by Linda Hitchcox in Vietnamese Refugees in Southeast Asian Camps (London: Palgrave Macmillan, 1990) and completed it with her own findings. Uncovering connections and filling in gaps, Chung has synthesized such data comprehensively to create visual forms for these understudied passages.

United Fruit Company's (UFCo) exclusive power in Central America and the Caribbean started in the beginning of 1900s and foregrounded U.S. policy towards Guatemala for many years to come. Unpacking the United States' history of commercial interest intertwined with political influence in Guatemala provides a window into the country's modern history of violent conflicts and its population's continuous northward migration. Within the premise of this project, Chung constructed its conceptual framework based on four key components: the history of UFCo's monopoly and influence in Guatemala's economy and politics; the U.S. Cold War policy towards Guatemala exemplified in the 1954 CIA-engineered coup d'etat deposing President Jacobo Árbenz; the civil war period (1960-1996) including the Guatemalan military massacre of indigenous peasants (1982) and the extrajudicial forced-disappearances and killings of Guatemalans in the capital by the National Police's Death Squad (1983-1985); the continuous violence linked to current transnational mega-projects taking place mainly in the highland of the country. The mixed-media works are the results of a painstaking research Chung undertook, culling materials from various sources such as books Bitter Fruit, Shattered Hope, Paper Cadavers: The Archives of Dictatorship in Guatemala, and Guatemala Never Again: the Official Report of the Human Rights Office, Archdiocese of Guatemala; archival documents from the CIA Historical Review Program, Operation Sofia, and Diario Militar; data from the Guatemala Human Rights Commission and of other sources to map the industrial sites where recent attacks of indigenous people took place.

Being the most catastrophic refugee crisis in the second half of the 20th century, yet the post-1975 exodus of almost two million Vietnamese, about one-third of whom died at sea, is not recognized as part of Vietnam's official history. Responding to this politically driven historical amnesia, Chung launched the Vietnam Exodus History Learning Project between 2015-2018, commissioning and working with a group of young painters in Saigon to study and render archival photographs of the Vietnamese refugee migration into paintings. Throughout critique sessions as part of the technical process, questions about the exodus arose and the artists actively took part in discussing this particular history.

During Chung's research in Hong Kong (2015-2018), she came across a group of homeless and stateless Vietnamese—the leftover refugees from the last century that were rejected by western countries for their prior involvement with crimes in Hong Kong—who had lived under a bridge in the Sham Shui Po area and joined by a group of new asylum seekers from Việt Nam. This encounter added more complexity to the final iteration of the project: photographs Chung took of their current living conditions and from her visits to former detention centers and refugee camps in Hong Kong, which housed the former refugees, are superimposed with iconic photographs of the exodus to create a digital sketch of a panoramic photo collage. The painters initially turned the sketch into seven-segment paintings (83 x 114 cm / each). Chung then worked with two of the artists to create a large-scale painting on a scroll of watercolor paper (113.5 x 924.5 cm) based on the sketch in its entirety. This scroll painting interweaves places, people, and events to portrait an epic exodus of Vietnamese refugees in the 20th century. The painting underpins the importance of seeing refugees as people and their lives as lived, as opposed to the practice of reducing their existence to ID numbers in detention centers and camps, or statistical data in reports and policy making. Moreover, the project aims to bring historical awareness to younger generations, with other perspectives that counter Việt Nam's single-narrative history produced through statecraft.

Drawn from the book Burning Country – Syrians in Revolution and War written by Leila Al-Shami & Robin Yassin-Kassab, this series of works on paper charts some of the events that led to Syria descending into a convoluted war, becoming a playground for opposite forces and foreign influences. These works aim to underscore the human dimension of the Syrian conflict, which is often overlooked in the complexity of politics in the Middle East (for a lack of a better term) region.

Chung first approached the holding of historical artifacts at Hitachi City Museum while doing field research for the 2016 Kenpoku Art Festival in Ibaraki. Through these objects, she examined some of the most significant time periods in the history of Hitachi and Japan and created her artistic intervention into the collection by displaying her artworks interspersedly with her careful curation of the artifacts. Chung was particularly captivated by the Hitachi no Kuni Fudoki, a chronicle of Hitachi Province that was presented to the court by the local government in the 8th century. Chung found an English translation of the fudoki's introduction and the sections on the Namekata and Kashima districts in an article by Mark C. Funke, published by Sophia University, Japan. Although the Hitachi Fudoki was required to contain mainly practical materials of the province, it reads more as a work of literature that was written in a language heavily influenced by Tang literary style. Compressed with many cultural details, historical narratives and mythical folklores, reading the three sections of the fudoki through an English translation is a translation process in itself – it requires imagination, approximation and reconstruction. With such approach, Chung's immersive installation at the Hitachi Museum asks the viewer to fill in the gaps between certain periods in the history of Hitachi and Japan with historical moments and events experienced by people in other places, inside and outside of Japan. Chung's intervention also suggests that the viewer contemplates between the blank spaces of their nation's official account, or of any nation's for that matter, the micro histories and hidden narratives that are told by the people other than the ruling oligarchy. Using Foucault's mirror as a heterotopia and presenting works depicting the experiences of elsewhere with Hitachi's, Chung's complex installation guides the viewer's gaze towards a parallel space, absent from the presence – It encourages the viewer to explore the representation of the absent, whether it's the history of Japan's nation building through conquering aboriginal groups as fleetingly mentioned in Hitachi no Kuni Fudoki, or the experiences of peoples and lands occupied by Japanese Imperial troops during WWII.

Chung's projects often heed geographer Nigel Thrift's call for renewed attention to the "spatial politics of affect" in everyday urban life.[1] As these textures of experience often challenge succinct and rational description, the notion of assemblage – in its definitions as an artistic method or as a collection of objects from an archaeological site – gives form to the sensory and emotional currents that characterize the particularities of the urban experience.

For this project, Chung conducted research into the history of Thủ Thiêm, a district in the Ho Chi Minh City metropolitan area razed for redevelopment as 'Thủ Thiêm New Urban Area,' a 657-hectare master-planned urban megaproject approved by the city government in 1996. About 15,000 multi-generation households had been evicted in Thủ Thiêm peninsula—many of the displaced residents traced their ancestors back to the area for more than three generations. The violence of this mass eviction took place not without resistance and noise of anti-corruption protests and went on in more than a decade. However, traces of life in the area were erased and the new urban area is taking form. Inspired by the archaeological discoveries of the Óc Eo culture in the Mekong Delta, Chung wanted to preserve some remnants of Thủ Thiêm's settlements. However, she chose to conduct her excavation and retrieval ahead of time (2013/2016). As such, the project eschews "the conventional ex-post facto placement of peoples within already historicized places in favour of situating them as a 'people yet to come' (in Deleuze's terminology) for future remembrance, as an act of becoming that presupposes a projected collective agency." [2]

Chung subsequently re-staged the fragments of her excavations and research in a negotiated form of artistic assemblage to evoke the daily rhythms and the complex layers of history of this once lively landscape. Found items, such as windows, children shoes, fragments of cement/ceramic tiles and household objects, and a concrete slab, were retrieved and encased as future relics, reorienting the viewer's aesthetic perception of these vernacular items' materiality. These shattered objects also function as material witnesses of such violent erasure. A series of twenty-six glass plates etched with text related the history of urban development driven through the rhetoric of imperialist and nation-building projects perform a mapping function, tracing the language of modernization and producing an archival narrative that spatially accompanies Chung's cartographic drawings. These texts are snippets of a historical process of reclaiming wastelands [khai hoang], from the pre-colonial time that continues throughout different periods, and into the present time.

The notion of clearing wastelands obscures the fact that these lands were long home to other peoples, especially Khmer and Cham. Being perceived by city dwellers as a shanty town 'housing the marginalized poor,' Thủ Thiêm had always been rendered empty in most maps of Sài Gòn,[3] although it is only across the river from the city center, densely populated, and as old as Sài Gòn itself. The historical rhetoric of expansion in Việt Nam[4] is articulated in the case of Thủ Thiêm as 'progress,' repeating the act of erasing as a civilizing mission, not at all different from the French colonial policy mise en valeur.

The speed of light in vacuum [c] is 299,792,458 m/s. The speed at which light propagates through transparent materials is less than [c]. The refractive index [n] of a material is the ratio between [c] and the speed [v] at which light travels in the material [$n=c/v$]. The refractive index of glass in visible light is around 1.5. Light in glass travels at 200,000 km/s. The refractive index of air in visible light is about 1.0003. Light travels in air at the speed very close to c. The light we see from the stars have left them years ago | the photons that cross the vacuum of space, travel for millions, billions and even trillions of years until they encounter our eyes | the dead stars we see so clearly in the sky of a city where there is no electric light.

How long does it take for a large-caliber projectile to traverse the air through artillery? How many shelling bombardments are needed to erase a city?

Life accumulated from thousands and thousands of years can now be contained in Victorian keepsake boxes | collecting dust for many thousands of years to come.

Cultural heirlooms | in ruins and rubble | all lit up.

The city resurrects momentarily from its death | when the first sun ray hits its debris. Lovers walk around, hand in hand | before realizing they can't find their own shadows. Children ride bicycles up and down little hills they don't remember being there | eyes wide open before nightfall | before all disappear behind distorted walls | and into dark bullet holes.

I dare you to tell me what Baudrillard and Foucault have to say now.

Dizziness grows as a discomfort. Ideas and concepts of home and Homs become blurry, interchangeable, darkened by fact and fiction. The notion and condition of having 'no home – not two homes.'^[1]

The building of a nation equates destruction. The ancient kingdom can only be re-constructed now through historical maps | data charts | reports | images; cities and lives reduced merely to dots, numbers, increasing day by day: IDP – the internally displaced persons | refugees | and refugee camps. This, too, has become abstraction | vaguely understood in one's imagination. Confusion created not by the lack of knowledge but an avalanche of information.

History repeats itself. History that marked the beginning of televised conflicts | and media downpours of human catastrophes in exotic and distant devastated topographies. History I want to forget | even deny.

As a young child, Chung experienced the 1978 historic flood in a New Economic Zone in the Mekong Delta of Việt Nam, where she and her family were forcibly relocated after the war. Chung has become interested in flooding as something natural and as indicative of Anthropocene disasters—particularly floods which have been intensified by hydropower development in the Mekong and with sea-level rise due to extreme climate impact. Discussing the resettlement of Vietnamese people in the Mekong Delta due to climate change, the United Nations Development Program confirms in 2014 that “the vast majority of displacement is triggered by climate and weather-related hazards”[1] but it hardly addresses the root cause of such disaster, in which dam construction is a major factor. [2] Dams alter the flow of water and with sudden fluctuations in water levels disrupt fish migration and spawning. Constricting water flows also means trapping the nutrient-rich sediment needed to fertilize rice paddies, to feed the fish and to replenish rich alluvial soil in preventing deltas from sinking and from saltwater intrusion. Reservoirs cannot replace the natural habitats essential to many of the more than 500 aquatic species native to the Mekong River. The hydropower projects in the upper and middle reaches of the Mekong continue to leave immeasurable negative impacts on the ecosystems in the Lower Mekong Basin, the lifeblood for almost 65 million people.

Chung’s cartographic drawings in The River Project render with gossamer precision and exquisite detail historic as well as projected patterns of flooding in Sài Gòn (HCMC) and the southern provinces of Việt Nam by 2050, based on a study published by the Asian Development Bank (ADB) in 2010. [3] On the contrary, her mixed media map up and down the river-migration of the fish poetically depicts Chung’s childhood memory of the 1978 Mekong flood, with leaping silver-colored fish she recalls seeing. The 2,800 mile waterway originated in the Tibetan plateau flows through Myanmar, Thailand, Laos, Cambodia, and empties itself into the East Sea (or Biển Đông—the Vietnamese name of South China Sea) off Việt Nam through nine tributaries under the local name sông Cửu Long. The Mekong River is central for the region’s economy as it sustains the world’s second largest inland fishery. Every year during the monsoon season, the Mekong summer floods increase the river’s flow enormously and as it comes rushing down, its main channel can’t contain this raging water; The river flows back upstream into the Tonle Sap Lake, expanding and temporarily turning it into one of the world’s largest rivers, given the poetic name the river that runs backward. During this time, billions of little fish grow fat in the submerged forest around the Tonle Sap and become the mainstay of the Mekong fishery.

Referencing Vonnegut's book Galápagos, the flora and fauna of Galápagos Archipelago, biblical stories, and semiotics, Galápagos Project is the overarching project title for interconnected yet singular groups of works shown in Berlin, Singapore, Manila, Brisbane, Kuandu, Sài Gòn (HCMC), Cuenca (Ecuador), New York City, and other cities in the Great Plains of the United States. Chung spent a great deal of time studying the decline of agricultural and industrial towns in Yamaguchi, Japan, where she stayed and visited defunct coal mines and small communities in the mountain areas around Akiyoshidai plateau. Galápagos Project is also drawn from Chung's research of the 1930's Dust Bowl in the Great Plains and other sites in Manila (Philippines) and Taipei (Taiwan). An interweaving of historical fact and fiction, and alternating temporal sequences, resonate throughout the various chapters of the project. Recurring themes include deindustrialization, depressions, deluges, post-apocalyptic landscapes, and great migrations.

While the Galápagos Project is based on the natural world and anthropogenic disasters, within a documentary mediation on deindustrialization and agricultural desolation, it encompasses both human destruction and transformation, seeking insights into living on the brink of utter ruins. In reference to Walter Benjamin's angel of history dashing into the future with his head turned back to the wreckage of progress, the video The Great Simplicity shows two men stomping through an abandoned modern amphitheater. The men frenetically and frantically circle each other while shouting undecipherable phrases of a mutated language, perhaps musing on the future ruins as envisioned and imagined by the artist. In the video Thousands of Years Before and After, the imagined post-apocalyptic human drifters wander in the immense grassland, in search of a new dwelling place and means of survival.

In most components of Galápagos Project a mass migration takes place, whether it be tortoises, rabbits, buffalo, giraffes, or elephants. At times clustered in small formations clinging to angled surfaces of seemingly submerged partial structures, as in twigs, bones, rocks and the Giant Tortoise and falling blue sky, frozen raindrops, or moving en masse by the thousands across pristine ice surfaces (roaming with the dawn – snow drifts, rain falls, desert wind blows, 2012), the viewer is transported into a fairy tale evoking the dawn of a prehistoric or post-apocalyptic age. Chung presents a veritable glass menagerie, fragile hordes of crystalline creatures touching our senses. The nomadic project appears to be a futile trajectory for these delicate beings, yet their collectivity signals strength and fortitude. While Chung's Galápagos Project can be seen as an allegorical fantasy that imagines our future ruins, it also suggests a new beginning.

TOMORROW ISN'T HERE references the 1930s Dust Bowl that marked the decline of the Great Plains, an extensive flatland region in the U.S. and part of Canada. The Dust Bowl exemplifies the resulting effects of climate variability interacted with human activity: the weather patterns shifted in 1930, causing the Pacific Ocean to become cooler and the Atlantic warmer – the agricultural practice that 19th century European immigrants brought to the region coupled with the increasing mechanization of farm equipment had converted the native grassland to cropland, especially with the rising wheat price during WWI. The process destroyed the topsoil of the Great Plains and displaced the deep-rooted grasses that protected the soil from drought and wind erosion. With such misuse of land, inappropriate agricultural practices, extreme drought and high winds brought severe dust storms to the Southern Plains in 1930s; about 25 million hectares of land and crops were destroyed, while people and livestock were killed in the choking dust. This led to a huge migration stream from the Dust Bowl counties, as well as those who came from other parts of Oklahoma, Texas, Arkansas, and Missouri: between 300,000-400,000 people migrated west during the Great Depression.

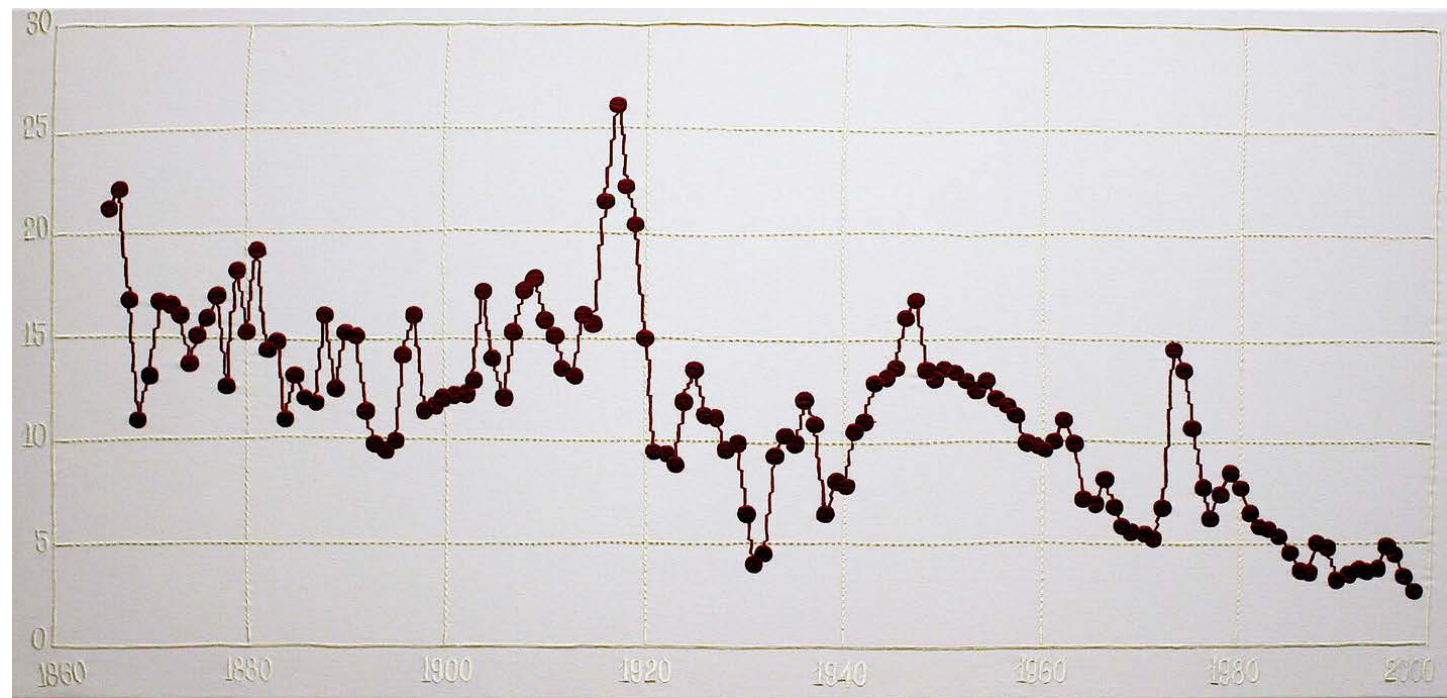

While the Galápagos Project is based on the natural world and anthropogenic disasters, within a documentary mediation on deindustrialization and agricultural desolation, it encompasses both human destruction and transformation, seeking insights into living on the brink of utter ruins. In the Fukagawa Shokudo (Fukagawa Dining Room) project, Chung approached a traumatized site, in this case, a historic building, and transformed it into a multidimensional stage for exhibition, play, performance,[1] and archive. The Fukagawa Shokudo (today's Fukagawa Tokyo Modan Kan) is the only surviving building from a series of public dining rooms commissioned by the Tokyo metropolitan government after the 1918 Kome Sōdō (rice riots) and 1923 earthquake. Conducted a comprehensive research into major socio-political and cultural developments in Japanese modern history, Chung's intervention provided a lens onto the intersections between urban heritage, community activism, and historical change.

To produce an interrelated body of work that was site-specific, in terms of relating to the historical context of the building, as well as the spatial conditions of the structure as an exhibition venue, Chung researched its chronology. Important aspects include its construction as part of early twentieth-century Shōwa Modan (Showa Modern) and as last in the series of shokudo. During the 1945 air raids its interior was destroyed but its external structure survived. Its historical significance and resilience has thus resulted in its current status as National Tangible Cultural Property.

The various components for this project held local relevance, yet also resonated with other global histories. A large stainless steel plaque etched with a chronology of the building and installed facing a series of historical images of the building with little context, its placement thus provides a more complete historical account of the structure. Her map drawings are based on Tokyo's urban plans at critical historical junctures, as the titles aptly specified. Vinyl decal words and phrases adorned the dining tables are selected from textual accounts and narratives pertaining to the Kome Sōdō; the 12 text panels created with a typewriter are direct excerpts from the book Riots and Citizens: Mass Protest in Imperial Japan by Michael Lawrence Lewis.

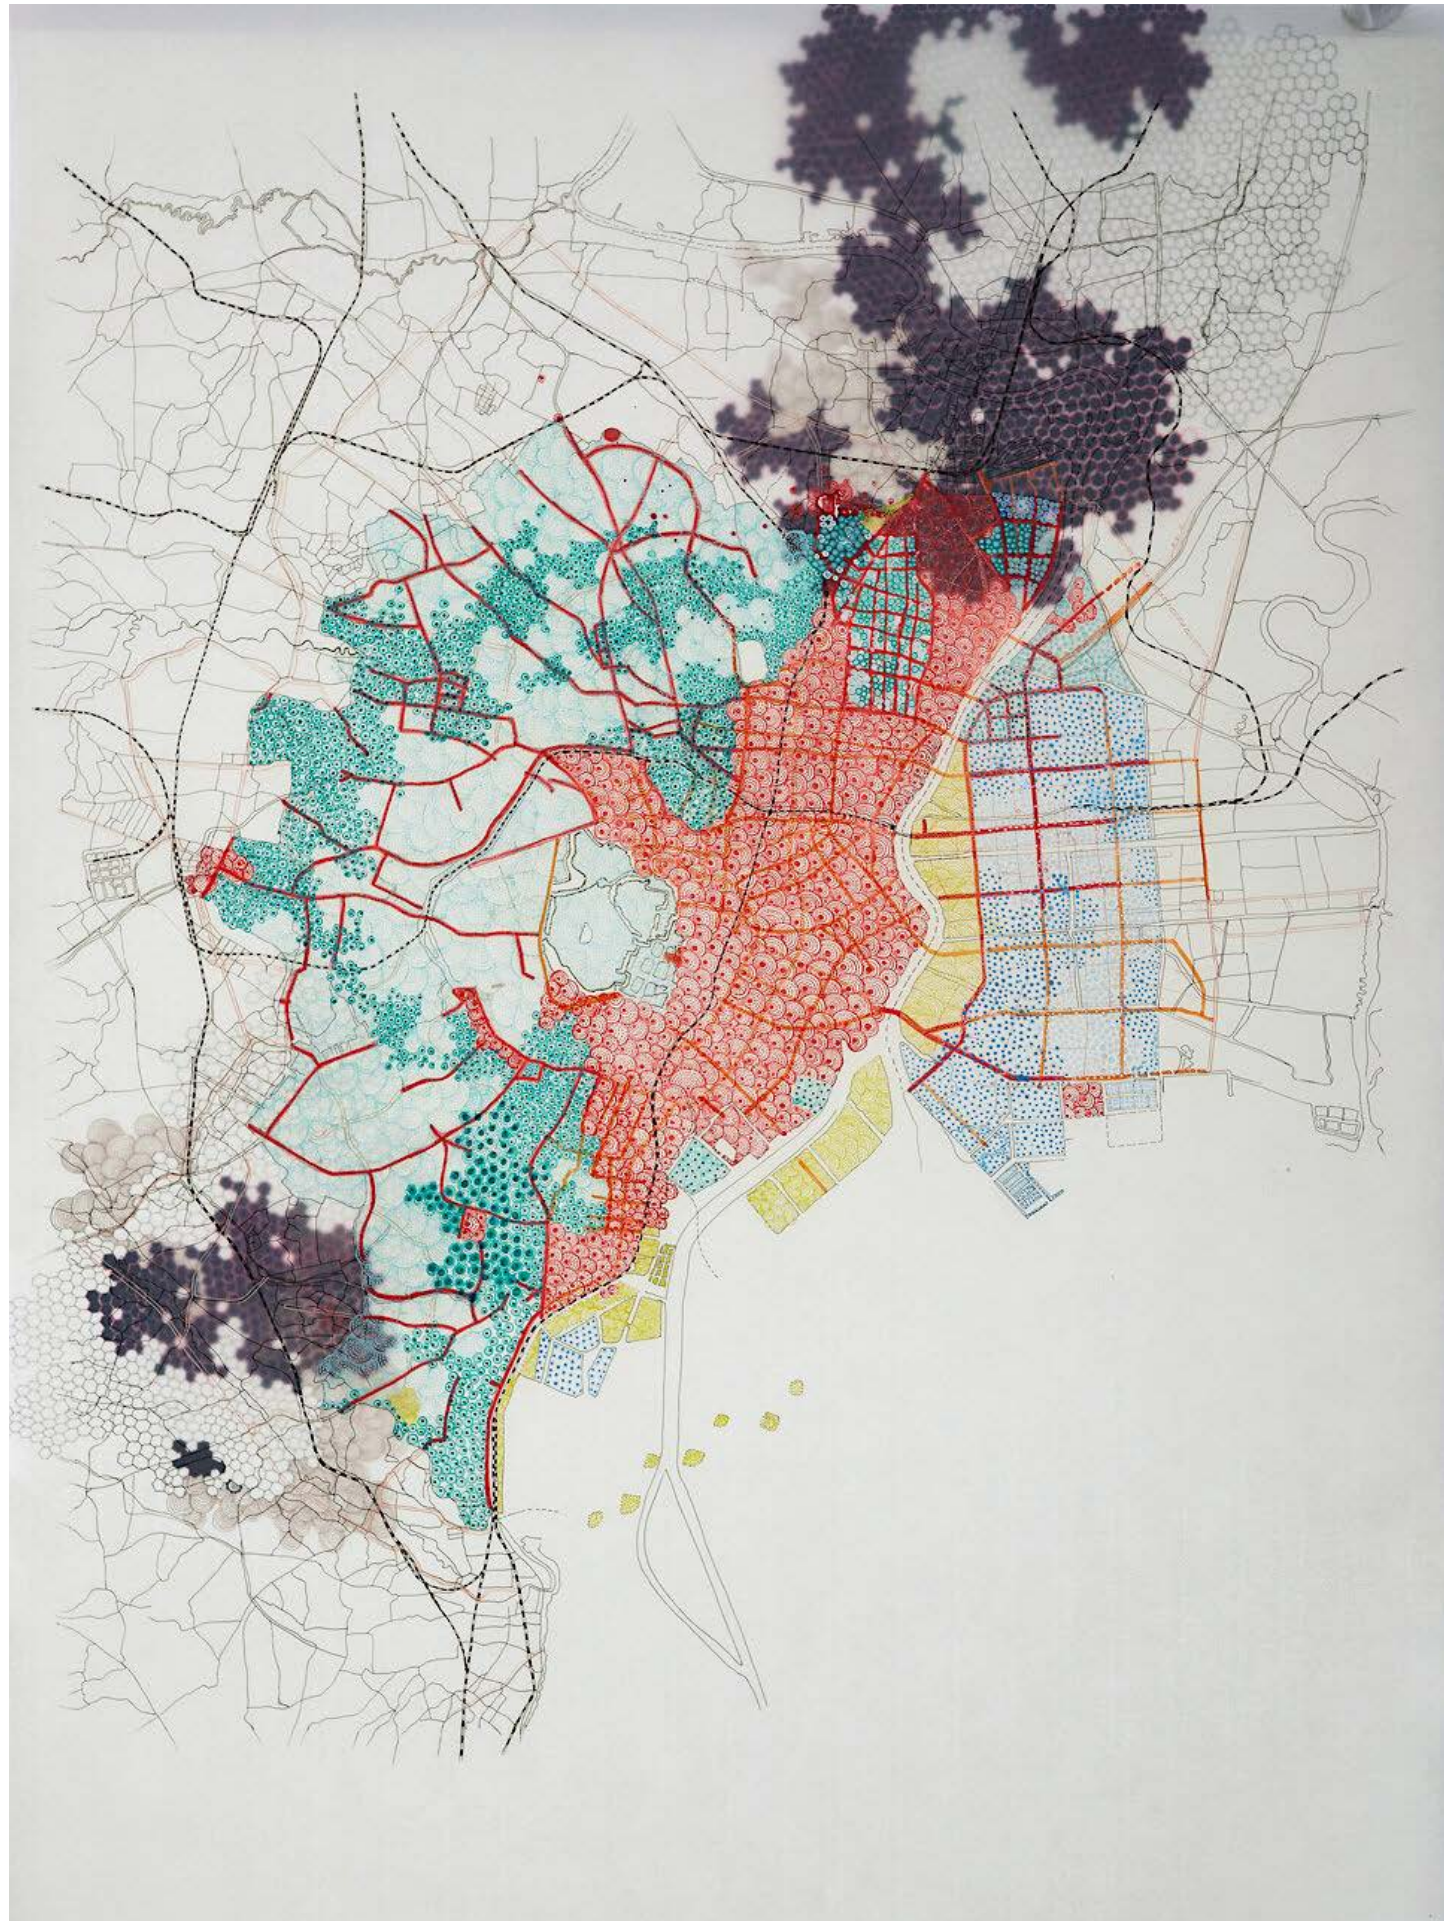

The video Well-side Gatherings: rice stories, the rioters, the speakers, and the voyeurs is a dance performance that Chung had directed in collaboration with Arabesque Dance Company, based in Sài Gòn (HCMC), references the origins of the rice riots, when fishermen's wives in a fishing village in Toyama Prefecture organized a protest in July 1918. The performance alludes to the prominent role played by these women, and their communal discussions in which they debated political and social issues during the food shortages. Chung described how they were, in a sense, the political activists of the period, and such a performance paid tribute to their lesser-known involvement in the events of the time. Yet Well-side Gatherings also serves as a reimagining of a scenario familiar to those who have experienced mass food shortages. For Chung, memories of the 1975-86 subsidy period (thời bao cấp) and the 1978 food shortage played a part in shaping her vision for the piece, in which the dancers forcefully and lyrically grapple over a brick to mark their place in line and fight for a single sack of rice, set against an oral reading of numerical figures from the Kome Sōdō. The performance would later be reinterpreted in a live multi-media theatrical performance directed and choreographed by Chung, titled Chronicles of a Soundless Dream.[2]

April 2009.

I recently asked my mother about her trips to this one river many years ago, where she stood quietly for hours by the riverbank—walls of fog surrounded her tiny frame, waiting and hoping for my father to appear from the other side through thick clouds of mist. Or so she had hoped. And there she kept waiting. 17th Parallel. The river is a poignant reminder of her youth, the fog her faithful friend. My mom was the prettiest girl in her school—her red scarf in winter, her little orange bicycle on windy afternoons, her thick black flowing hair, her silky light skin, her not-so-lucky life. I wish I could have known her back then. I wish I could have been her friend. I'm mesmerized by the beauty of her youth, the strength of her hope, the river where she stood—with its walls of fog and the passing of time.

August 2009.

Almost four decades after my father's helicopter coming down in flames during the 1971 Operation Lam Sơn 719 in Laos, I came across an NHK TV Documentary program featuring Please Yuko, Tell me where you are, from your mom and Please Tell Me - Hiroshima, The Recalling Messages of the Atomic Bomb. Over fifty years after the 1945 nuclear destruction, part of the old Fukuromachi Elementary School in Hiroshima was opened to public as a peace museum. In 1999, during renovation, hidden messages inscribed on charred blackboards and soot-covered walls by the hibakusa (A-bomb victims) were revealed. Only 460 meters away from ground zero, the school became a rescue station and temporary shelter for the hibakusha, while its blackened boards and walls were message boards for the burnt victims desperately wanting to find their loved ones. Watching these documentaries I thought a lot about physical and intangible walls that had divided people and nations, about my mother waiting in vain near the 17th Parallel during the 1973 P.O.W. swap between North and South Vietnam, and about my father not being allowed by North Vietnam to cross the river and reunite with her. On each side of any walls, visible and invisible, a silent space stands in between historical and personal memories. This silent space is called ma in haiku and eastern cultures, only to be understood without being spoken. As beautiful as the ma concept is, this space sometimes gets lost between the lines we read in history books with statistical data, memorial walls, and packaged tours' pamphlets. With the passage of time, personal memories of the most traumatic conflicts of our 20th century also have faded away and many stories gone untold. I researched and gathered stories and memories shared on the online forums of many communities: hibakusha, post-1975 Vietnamese war refugees (a.k.a. 'boat people'), Cambodian war refugees, exiled Tibetans, North and South Koreans, and people that were separated by the Berlin Wall and the Cold War in Europe. Their messages were then written, engraved, and rubbed with powdered pigments on children blackboards hand-crafted from reclaimed wood—while some were embroidered on hand-stitched satchels made from reclaimed army tents. These gestures allude to the mental and physical scars that war permanently leaves in people's psyche and bodies. While the project raises the question of whose stories can be told and through which means, the writing on chalkboards and the mark-making and remapping in Chung's cartographic works attempt to reclaim the narrative, whether from state-sponsored history, politically-driven historical amnesia, or in popular culture productions — shifting our victim position to one with agency. As a whole project, Scratching the Walls of Memory aims to amplify the voices of those not being heard, contribute to the rewriting of histories as told by the people, and pay tribute to those who lost their lives in conflicts around the world, most of the time senselessly and convolutedly.

These sculptural works imagine the city being evolved into an entity larger than itself - a seductive but isolated machinery, where cultural histories and memories have ceased to exist. This fantastical metropolis invokes a utopian realm whose perception lies beyond physical vision. This is a metaphor for all that the city of the future promises: dreams of progress, modernity, light, and spectacle. Chung's vision also evokes the more mechanized dimension, the industrial and technological basis for such wondrous developments in highly planned cities. Her play with scale provokes viewers to question whether they are looking at a city in miniature or an enlarged computer memory board, its surfaces meticulously covered with colorful patterns, concealing the workings within.

Living in Japan and Vietnam during this time, Chung was particularly interested in the ベッドタウン or beddotaun (bed town) phenomenon in Japan and the urbanization frenzies that Vietnam was (and still is) undergoing, especially areas in Saigon where rural and urban intersect. She observed the city and inhabitants through spatial and cultural transformations linked to progress and economic development. Chung is acutely aware of how such development articulates the politics of disremembering, whether through the state-shaped historical amnesia with the promise of progress, or due to the dominant pull of economic power. Chung's sculptures created during this time reflect the power discrepancy between inner and outer cities and within a society, as well as the displacement of its population. These works anticipate her later projects that unpack the power structure in the global geopolitical context that contributes to displacement and refugee migration.
